

CHARTRES IN THE DARK

By Donald Platt

It was almost sunset when the cathedral rose out of the rolling December farmland, fields still green with winter wheat. One moment there was nothing but horizon and muddy sky.

Then its two gray spires appeared as we drove over the next hill. I first saw those red and blue rose windows—muted sunlight flooding through leaded petals—

when I was fifteen, the age of our younger daughter Lucy. Because that dark light had branded its afterimage on my brain, I was taking my family thirty-seven years later to Chartres to show them stained-glass sunrise. By the time we reached the cathedral after countless roundabouts, whose small red and white triangular signs said, “Cede the passage” or “You do not have priority,” it was dark. We walked the nave. I pointed to the now black mosaics of stained glass, tried to describe for my wife and two daughters, who had never seen them, the haloed apostles. I failed, stood silent under extinguished windows in the dim half-light of the south ambulatory, and had to imagine

La Belle Verrière,
the blue mother holding her rust-robed child while gold censers swung incense over their heads and angels bore white candles to light their winding way. The dark glass illumined the boredoms and terrors of 12th-century

French peasants.
Somewhere in the central window of the west façade, a mother lay bleeding on a gold fourposter.

Joseph dozed on a chair. Their newborn cried himself beet-red, finally slept, watched over by a drooling ox. I remembered how once Dana and I came down with flu simultaneously and lay in bed, sitting up only to vomit into mixing bowls, while our six-month-old daughter Eleanor howled in her crib for milk. We were too sick to feed her.

I still discover scrap paper, stuck in old books, with long lists in Dana's hand, "Right 2:40, left 5:05," in red pen to help her keep track of which breast Eleanor, who's now nineteen, had nursed last.

Right breast, left breast, her mother weaned her. I couldn't find the window in which Christ, tied to a post, got beaten by two men, one with a cricket bat, the other with a flail shaped like a broom. At sixteen Eleanor had walked with the handsome stranger to his top-floor apartment where he tried to rape her. She ran down 20 flights of stairs. In the starless Charlemagne window, Roland pierced the black giant Ferragut with a silver sword through his navel, the only vulnerable spot on Irongut's body. To the left of the altar my father hung crucified on Alzheimer's cross. My mother and I took him down from that tree, washed his wounds, perfumed his body, stuffed a stone in the open mouth of his grave. For nine centuries Charlemagne had gazed at the Milky Way, cornucopia of God's coronation jewels, and tried to read there his fate or fortune in the next day's battle. I could not see how the three butchers hacked at legs of lamb on a long table. Or how two bakers carried a man-sized wicker basket of round loaves hung on a pole they shouldered. The loaves looked like cobblestones.

I was condemned to eat them and shit blood. On our journey from Provence, my internal hemorrhoids had ruptured, turned the water in the toilet bowl—no getting around it—the same unearthly red as the stained glass of Chartres, sunset or sunrise, cumulus clouds of blood

I flushed. Rose windows, because you showed me in the dead of winter how my small life shone through your blacked-out panes forty feet above me, I knelt down in that empty cathedral. I kissed the old worn stones we walked on. Nothing could have been colder.
